

Caption: Andean farmers developed freeze-drying as a means to preserve potatoes for long periods of time. Much of the potato crop during Inka times was made into chuño, a freeze-dried food that was easy to transport and could be stored for years. Photo by Isabel Hawkins, 2014.